FROM GAY PARIS.

Rev. A. T. Ennis Writes From the French Capital.

PARIS, FRANCE, August 25th, 1899.

Editor Maysville Ledger: I have found Paris as warm and brilliant as ever. The city of the world has charms not to be found in any other capital of Europe. The weather is at present a trifle too warm; perhaps I feel more at home after a few days residence at Lucerne, Switzerland, where the air was extremely cool and invigorating. The contrast between the awful solitude of those mountains, which rise in the blue sky like so many sentinels of eternity, and the boulevards of Paris is so great as to produce the illusion of living on a different planet.

The first evening after my arrival I attended the top of one of the many omnibuses that run directly through the principal avenues and again enjoyed the sight of reviewing the dazzling life of the metropolis in all its varied form. The boulevards des Capucines and des Italiens, culminating in the Place de la Concorde and the Elysée Fields are like a dream of beauty. The gardens of Les Tuileries seen at night ablaze with myriads of lights, the air redolent with perfume and musical with the symphony of sweet sounds, are more of a fairy scene than an earthly abode. The Parisians know the secret of enjoying themselves. Sitting in the shelter of odoriferous bowers, walking along smooth and flower-fringed paths, families and friends seem to forget the stern realities of life after the day's work.

THE HORSE SHOW.

There Will Be Handsome Premiums and Plenty of Entertainment.

For women and children of Maysville and Mason and adjoining counties an especial feature to interest them to all the fair people having in charge the Ohio Valley Capital and Horse Show, which will be held on the Fairgrounds next week beginning Thursday, September 12, and continuing alternate days and evenings till Saturday. It is the music and vaudeville features. Maysville's Bands and Band itself has been engaged and will discourse inspiring music at stated intervals, while from a stage in front of the amphitheater jugglers, trick riders, high wire performers, singers and a whole list of stars will perform between rings and races. The low price of admission—25 cents to all—the free use of stalls for horses, the comforts and conveniences which will be distributed around for the pleasure of the people appeal with great fairness to those who are seeking much at little expense.

JOHN YOUNG BROWN.

Immense Crowd at the Court-house Yesterday Afternoon to Hear Him.

MASON COUNTY NOT FOR GOEBEL.

Yesterday morning at 10:10 o'clock over the C. and O. Railway, the Hon. John Young Brown, who had been advertised as the true Democratic candidate for Governor to speak in the Court-house, arrived in the city. He was met at the station by a local reception committee who escorted him to the Central Hotel, where after a short rest he held an informal levee, many old friends and young Democrats calling to pay their respects to the gallant ex-Governor and the speaker who stands in the portrait gallery of Kentucky's famous Governors.

The old town began filling up with the farmer elements and before noon one of the largest crowds of strangers ever seen in our hotel was upon our streets.

At 1 o'clock the Maysville Hall boarded a streetcar, bannered appropriately, and after a tour of the town proceeded to the Court-house where the speaking was to be.

A crowd taking every available spot in the Court-house, as well as the yard, Court street and immense vestibule in front was present. The presence of the distinguished speaker escorted by Chairman James H. Hall was the signal for applause as springs from men who love independence, right and manhood.

He was greeted by "My Old Kentucky Home," strains of which found echo in the preliminary remarks of the ex-Governor.

In a very few words Mr. Hall introduced Mr. Brown and immediately his forensic knife dissected the political issues which have split the grand old party in Kentucky.

The frenzied attempt of some hoodlums to cheer King Goebel was started, to draw from the ex-Governor such biting sarcasm and withering remarks as to silence such conduct for the future.

Possibly no political demonstration in the annals of local politics ever drew such a class of citizens—men in all walks of life, thinkers who will not vote blindly as do those office-seekers and henchmen who follow after popular leaders—and it is safe to predict that the many converts to the principles as enunciated by ex-Governor Brown drew to him many hundreds of votes, and the effect upon Goebel, fraud and thief, is so apparent today as to leave no question as to where Mason county will stand after the count in November next.

The contrast between the awful solitude of those mountains, which rise in the blue sky like so many sentinels of eternity, and the boulevards of Paris is so great as to produce the illusion of living on a different planet.

PREPARING FOR EXPOSITION.

The first evening after my arrival I attended the top of one of the many omnibuses that run directly through the principal avenues and again enjoyed the sight of reviewing the dazzling life of the metropolis in all its varied form. The boulevards des Capucines and des Italiens, culminating in the Place de la Concorde and the Elysée Fields are like a dream of beauty. The gardens of Les Tuileries seen at night ablaze with myriads of lights, the air redolent with perfume and musical with the symphony of sweet sounds, are more of a fairy scene than an earthly abode. The Parisians know the secret of enjoying themselves. Sitting in the shelter of odoriferous bowers, walking along smooth and flower-fringed paths, families and friends seem to forget the stern realities of life after the day's work.

The papers of all the Nations are now full of the trial held at Rennes and Dreyfus is the hero of the hour. According to them France is at present going through a dangerous ordeal fraught with future misery and peril. I expected to find Paris in a terrible ferment, and my view on the train was troubled with dreams of possible barricades and the din of street battles. When I saw that the people calm resigned everyone everywhere. The people amuse themselves, walk about, sip their coffee and attend to their business as they ever do. The local Journal of anti-semitism, paper, Monsieur Guerin, has been declared under arrest for certain deeds and writings of his considered libel by the powers that be. The gentleman and all connected with his printing office conceived the happy thought of resisting authority by intrenching themselves in their house, Rue Chabrol. The place has been converted into a veritable fort, men standing by the windows with loaded guns. The Government, unwilling to use extreme measures, has surrounded the house with a regiment of infantry with the view of starving the garrison, so no articles of food are permitted to be taken through the military line. Last night some two hundred women went there carrying provisions. The papers had announced their intention and place of operations. I took a cab and was driven to the door of the house. The soldiers refused to let the Amazons pass; there was a little charge, some running, but no one was hurt, and the people laughed. The affair seen by electric light was truly frenzied and spectacular. Today the official organs hint that the authorities are determined to end the farce by force if necessary. My opinion is that the poor Captain Dreyfus is suffering for the sake of others. I hope that France will do the right thing, by declaring him innocent and atoning honorably for past offenses. A compromise seems now impossible. It may be a bitter pill, but the sick man must take his medicine. The question of race and religion should be relegated to the tropical regions where it came. Scheming politicians and persons fond of being in muddy waters have caused all this trouble. There is no fear of international complications arising from the conclusion of this unfortunate incident.

Preparations for the great world exposition of 1900 are going on here on a scale that is simply astounding. From the Place de la Concorde up to the Trocadero houses have been torn down on either side of the Seine and most imposing buildings erected on the spot. The Elysée Fields and the surroundings of the Invalides are lined with edifices destined to remain as objects of art and beauty. In the very center of Paris another city will arise such as the French can only design and put up. I have seen it and do not hesitate to call the gigantic structure one of the best in the world. It is to be feared that the American White City of '93 will lose its dazzling splendor before this brilliant crown of new century. I could hardly express a sigh when the thought forced itself into my mind that I will not be able to see the final consummation of the wonder. The Louvre, as everybody knows, is a very treasure house of art and antiquities. It would take two hours and a half simply to walk through the different halls without stopping a single moment to admire even one of the precious works tabernacled there. I began with the picture gallery. It is the glorious synthesis of all the classic schools of paintings in the broad earth. Rome, Venice, Bologna, Florence, Milan and Perugia are well represented by masterpieces of infinite value. The museum of the pencil of Raphael, Vinci, Titian, Bellini, Veronese, Fra Angelico, Tintoretto and Perugino is heard under these sacred walls. Naturally the mind is a little distressed by the viewing of so many masters in the cities where they lived and worked, concentration on a single system gives more pleasure and instruction. Withal having come prepared no discordant note marred the great symphony of color and line. Van Dyck and Rembrandt gave a place of honor alone with Rubens who, like Pietro da Cortona in Florence, immortalized on the canvases the Medicen family in Paris. The beautiful vision of Murillo's "Immaculate Conception" and "Holy Mary" lures on the enchanted eye and the style used to express them is in perfect keeping with the conceived ideal. Poussin and Lorraine have painted some landscape scenes that rival in beauty of execution those of the Venetian School of the 16th century. Seriousness is not wanting in them, and many give unmistakable proofs of a mystic tendency.

By the way I found the original of the copy of the "Deposition from the Cross" hanging over the main altar of St. Patrick's Church in Maysville. It was painted in the 17th century by Jouvenot. I recognized it at once, holding a piece of pronouncement in the "Square Hall." "Room IV." The modern French School of the "impressionists" studied in the Palais de Luxembourg where their works are exhibited for two years before taking them to the Louvre. The department of ancient, medieval and modern statuary is extensive and abundantly rich. I lingered long in the Asiatic Museum. Half of the discoveries made at Nineveh and Babylon are stored away in this artistic palace, the other half being kept in the British Museum. Statues, sculptures and colossal columns dug up in the land of the biblical Nimrod are most judiciously arranged for inspection. Here I saw again the inscription in cuneiform characters which have thrown so much light on the veracity and history of the Old Testament. In the Egyptian Museum the collection is one of the most important in Europe. With delight I look before the Sphinxes, Voyné stones, statues and sarcophagi that date, according to ancient Occidentals, from many centuries before the Christian era. Not only in the Egyptian Museum, but in the Museum of antiquities are to be seen. Throughout the endless rooms the diligent searcher may find anything from a ring worn by a lady in the days of Pericles to the dainty sword of the cavaliers of Louis XIV. The Parisians are proud of their collection of art, monuments of antiquity and mediæval curiosities. In the midst of fashionable Paris I found some Roman ruins—the relics of the palace where Julian was declared Emperor of Rome. Having been restored, it became the residence of the early Frankish kings, who gave it to the monks of Cluny when the royal seat was transferred to the "Cite." After the suppression of this religious order the French Government changed the Abbey into a Museum; and a museum it is. In it are to be seen Gallic weapons and armours, royal carriages and Bishop's mitres, chalices and imperial beds, rosaries and ladies shoes of the 16th century. The so-called volatiles Frenchman is also an excellent tabulator of the inorganic, vegetable and animal kingdoms. At the Trocadero there is a complete and astounding collection of all sorts of minerals. In the "Garden des Plantes" and in the "Garden of Acclimation" there are specimens of all the known herbs, plants and flowers which grow or grew in any corner of the globe. The celebrated Museum of Clavier in the former place is a wonderful display of dead animals that ever breathed air, whilst in both places every kind of living animal, lion, elephant, monkey, horse, bird, insect or reptile that roars, grins, hisses, sings or hisses in the open air or in comfortable cages heated or cooled to suit the nature of the beast. Acquaintance to be seen in various places plentifully supplied with fishes swimming in temperate water.

In almost all the cities of Europe I had to pay one franc or more to be admitted to galleries and museums. In Paris no fee at all.

FROM GAY PARIS.

is charged. France seems to be conscious of the treasures accumulated in her capital, and with a pride both commendable and enlightened she says to the world, "Come and see." This spirit it is that builds the new city for the coming century—a city destined to be the wonder of the 20th century.

The Churches of the metropolis have a charm and a meaning peculiar to the North American. I have reference to those ecclesiastical edifices built early in the 16th or 17th centuries. Notre Dame, solemn and austere, is a Gothic poem. In the precincts of that sacred place where pillars rise in majestic grandeur till they are lost in a mystic twilight, feelings of awe involuntarily are quickened in the soul such as must have thrilled Goethe's or softened Napoleon's. I knelt in prayer in the recess of an arch, and understood why faith seeks the name of its visible of stone monumental and grand.

St. Germain's is another typical Church founded in the time of Charlemagne, bearing all the marks of age. The French of the Renaissance drew their inspiration from Greek models in the erection of new temples. "La Madeleine" is one of the most perfect pieces of Athenian architecture to be seen in the world. The exact resemblance to a pagan shrine does not detract one charm from its exquisite beauty. The Corinthian columns surrounding it with their graceful capitalizing on a platform of solid masonry are a masterpiece of architectural lines. Perhaps the Parthenon looked like this temple, affording a most striking proof of the espousal of classic beauty with the genius of Christianity.

The Pantheon rose under the same inspiration, and now holds in its marble embrace the mortal part of a man whose grateful country has dedicated it in a moment of mistaken enthusiasm. The Goddess of Liberty towering in the very sanctuary where once an altar stood, no longer under the shadow of religion, but now and then with a marble image for the descendants of St. Louis. "L'Eglise des Cordeliers" is a National monument in the present marbles and admirable in the grandeur of its construction.

Under a lofty dome gilded and glittering in the rays of the sun, the trophies and resting on a mosaic floor stands a colossal sarcophagus of polished granite. It is the tomb of Napoleon I. In it sleeps the dreamless sleep the hero of many battles, the Captain whose brow was encircled with the imperial crown. Having died an exiled man, the historic rock of St. Helena, his enemies granted his last request which in chapters of gold are inscribed at the entrance of the crypt "I desire that my ashes rest on the bank of the Seine, in the midst of the French people I loved so much."

What sentiments must surge from the depths of any human heart breathing about the cold stone that incloses all that was mortal of the great Bonaparte. Did ambition sway the mind of the conqueror of the blood-thirsty Convention? Did he offer the altar of personal vanity the blood of the heroes and of many childless mothers? Perhaps so; and now that the hand which once wielded the sword of victory has crumbled to dust, his faults may be forgotten to think only of his glory. On that marble a finger might have traced the words "Vanity of vanity, and all is vanity."

In mixing with the Parisians, allays politics and obliging to strangers, I took opportunity to sound them on the subject of our late war with Spain. They are unanimous in calling it very cruel and unavailing. When told of the Spanish treatment of the poor Cubans, they shrug their shoulders and smilingly remark, "Why did you not interfere when the Sultan was murdering the Armenians?" It seems impossible to get the notion out of their heads that America went into the business for commercial considerations, and that they were very decided on this point. Generally they have and show great respect for our country.

To a very suave gentleman, whose pleasant acquaintance I made, I remarked that the French seemed the American tourists in the most outrageous manner. The most interesting thing I saw was the American and able to travel the wealthy children of the sister Republic are legitimate prey. The sentence uttered in the most classic French sound very nice, but the emotion was not seconded by me. He showed some surprise, and to prove that I was wrong he exclaimed: "Monieur, who travels in the French railways first class? Why, the tourists and Americans." Next to me at the table the hotel where I stop I have a thoroughbred Englishman from England. Old and was he never free of asking questions. Do the Americans like us? What do they think of us over there? What are you going to do with the Philippines? In England we think that General Ogle is doing some good work. When peace is established America will send few persons to keep order in the new possessions. The wink in the eye and the curl in the lip make evident the "carrie pence." Once I broke out: "What are you going to do with the Transvaal?" "We are going to make a colony of it pretty soon and send our best troops to the green pastures. Humanity is a very great Vegetarian tree and we are all sheep of the same flock."

I am penning this letter after returning from a pleasant walk in the Elysian Fields. Night here is changed into day, and I could see along the banks of the Seine and as the eyes could reach the vast new city built for the coming Exposition. The work is not finished. What a magic scene it will offer when the President of the Republic will formally inaugurate the event before the representatives of all the Nations of the world! The traditional reputation of the capital is the same as of old, no effort, no money or labor will be spared to make the occasion a red-letter day in the history of France. Blessed must be the eyes that GORMANBURG, Ky., Sept. 12.—George Workman, deputy sheriff, went to the country to arrest George Cabell (colored) on a warrant charging him with attempting to commit a criminal assault upon a woman named White. This was Workman's second trip to arrest Cabell, he failing the first time to locate him.

Wince Pattison, colored, was sent forward to ascertain whether or not Cabell was in a certain house, and if he was to give a signal agreed upon.

When Pattison got within 40 yards of the house Cabell appeared at the door with a rifle and took aim at Pattison, who exclaimed: "Don't shoot me!" but Cabell shot him through the chest, killing him almost instantly. Workman, who was near by, hurried forward, and Cabell attempted to shoot him, but his gun failed to work, and he was at once arrested.
